Dear [name],

I am applying for the [role] position at [company]. I will be straight about where I am: I am at the beginning of a product career, seven months into a deliberate move out of law.

What I am not at the beginning of is the work underneath product. As a paralegal and then Senior Case Manager, my day started with an intake interview: someone anxious, describing a symptom rather than a problem, often withholding the detail that turned out to decide the case. My job was to ask the right questions, reconstruct what they actually needed, and turn it into a plan a team could execute — up to twelve complex matters at once with eight specialists reporting to me. When the process itself was the bottleneck I rewrote it, and that rewrite became how the team worked by default. That is discovery and spec writing with the labels removed.

I have made the transition formal rather than aspirational: a U.S.-standards project management course run by the Yerevan American Corner with the U.S. Embassy, a month of C programming at 42 Yerevan completed alongside a full-time job, second place at HackNation, and a B2B product concept of my own built around AI voice and text agents on RAG. The concept has been the most useful teacher — it is where I learned what retrieval quality, handover to a human and an unhappy path actually cost you.

I am applying junior on purpose. I want to learn product properly in a team that will hold me to a standard, and I would rather be honest about the gap than dress it up. What you get immediately is someone who will talk to your users, write requirements your engineers do not have to decode, and keep the follow-through tight.

I would be glad to walk you through how I would run discovery on one of your current product questions. Thank you for your time.

Sincerely,

Ishkhan Khchoian
