Dear [name],

I am applying for the [role] position at [company]. I am a career changer, so let me put the honest version first: I have not shipped software, and I have six years of doing the job that delivery actually consists of.

As Senior Case Manager I ran up to twelve complex client projects in parallel, end to end, against deadlines set by someone else and impossible to move. Eight specialists reported to me on their own workloads; I reviewed their output against written acceptance criteria and handled the escalations. When the process itself turned out to be the bottleneck, I rewrote the templates, checklists and hand-offs, and that rewrite became how the team works by default. Before that I produced live events for audiences up to 3,000 with several productions running at once — the closest thing to a release date outside software, and it taught the same lesson: a plan is worthless the moment it stops matching reality, so you keep it matching reality.

The transition was deliberate, not a drift. I completed a U.S.-standards project management course run by the Yerevan American Corner with the U.S. Embassy, finished a month of C programming at 42 Yerevan while still working full time, took second place at HackNation, and have been developing my own B2B concept around AI voice and text agents on RAG. That last one matters less as a product than as evidence: I can sit in a technical conversation and follow it.

I am applying at coordinator or junior level on purpose. I would rather learn your pipeline, your definition of done and your release rhythm properly than arrive claiming to know them. What you would get immediately is someone who keeps the board honest, chases the dependency before it becomes a blocker, and writes things down.

I would welcome a short conversation about where your delivery currently leaks time. Thank you for your consideration.

Sincerely,

Ishkhan Khchoian
