PROFILE

What I bring to product is six years of the work underneath it: talking to users, finding the real problem behind the stated one, and writing it down clearly enough that engineers can build from it. For six years that was my job in everything but name — client intake was my daily work, and the people I interviewed described symptoms rather than problems and withheld the detail that decided the outcome.

Since leaving law in February 2026 I have made it formal: a U.S.-standards project management course, 2nd place at HackNation, a month of C at 42 Yerevan, and my own B2B concept around AI voice/text agents and RAG — which has taught me more about where products fail than any course would.

One interview is enough — give me 30 minutes and a real problem from your team, and you'll see how I work.

WHY ME FOR THIS ROLE

- Discovery. Several hundred structured intake interviews. The skill a product discovery call needs — asking past the stated request — is the one I have been practising longest.
- Requirements that survive contact with engineering. I rewrote the workflows, templates and checklists at M&M and they became the team standard. Writing something precise enough that other people execute it without me is the part I enjoy most.
- Metrics and evidence. Six years of legal analysis: read a dense corpus, find the one fact that decides the outcome, and defend the reasoning in writing. That transfers directly to reading a funnel and defending a prioritisation call.
- Shipping alongside engineers. A month of C at 42 Yerevan and an AI product concept of my own — enough to follow a technical trade-off discussion rather than nod through it.
- Delivery discipline. 12 complex projects in parallel, 8 specialists coordinated, events for up to 3,000 people. A crowded roadmap will not overload me.
- Founder-adjacent by habit. I am used to being handed the ambiguous half of a problem — I deputised for the team lead at Shamayev and was the escalation point at M&M.
