Dear [name],

I am applying for the [role] position at [studio]. Let me be straight about what I do and do not have.

What I do not have is a shipped title. What I do have is six years of the part of production that goes wrong first: scope, schedules, dependencies and the written process a team actually runs on. As Senior Case Manager I carried up to twelve complex projects in parallel, coordinated eight specialists, reviewed their work against defined acceptance criteria, and rewrote the process documentation the team now works from. At Hosq I produced live events for audiences of 100 to 3,000 — several at once, on dates that could not move, with vendors and a crew who all needed the schedule to be honest. That is the closest thing to a launch date outside software, and it taught me the same lesson: a plan is worthless the moment it stops matching reality, so you keep it matching reality.

The other half is the product. I have played since 2003 and competitively for most of it — mythic raiding and a 4,000+ Raider.IO score, 2,400 arena rating in WoW, 5,000 MMR in Dota 2, CS since 1.6. I have watched a balance patch reshape a meta and felt a progression curve go wrong from the inside. When your designers argue about retention, pacing or matchmaking, I will follow the argument on the merits rather than nodding along and asking for a glossary afterwards. I have also been teaching myself game design and QA fundamentals, and I can write a bug report your engineers will not have to send back for reproduction steps.

I moved into this deliberately: I left a stable legal career in February 2026, completed a U.S.-standards project management course run by the Yerevan American Corner with the U.S. Embassy, finished a month of C programming at 42 Yerevan alongside a full-time job, and placed second in the HackNation local pitches. I am applying at a junior level on purpose — I would rather learn your pipeline properly than overstate what I know about making games.

I would welcome twenty minutes to hear what you are building and where an organised pair of hands would take work off your producers. Thank you for your time.

Sincerely,

Ishkhan Khchoian
