PROFILE

Project manager who has actually run building work: 15+ construction and retail projects, at times three sites in parallel, with crews from 2 to 20 — contractors, procurement, transport, tenders, and the schedule holding it together when a supplier misses a date. This is where I first built Gantt charts and where I learned to own an outcome rather than a task list.

The other half of my background is law: civil-contract analysis, claims, and six years of international legal operations. For a construction or PropTech company that combination is unusual and practical — the same person reads the contract, runs the site schedule, and writes the process down so it survives after the project ends. I am now applying it to software, with U.S.-perspective project management training behind me.

One interview is enough — give me 30 minutes and a real problem from your team, and you'll see how I work.

WHY ME FOR THIS ROLE

- I have been on site, not just on the Gantt chart. 15+ delivered projects, three running at once, teams of 2–20. When your users describe a problem with subcontractor scheduling or a snag list, I have lived it rather than read about it.
- Tenders and procurement. Prepared and competed in tenders, managed building-supply vendors, materials and transport logistics end to end.
- Contracts are native to me. Law degree plus six years of civil-contract analysis and claims. In construction the schedule and the contract are the same argument, and I can read both.
- Domain vocabulary for PropTech discovery. A product for builders, developers or property managers needs someone who can interview them without a glossary. I have been the customer of that software.
- Parallel delivery under fixed dates. 12 complex client projects at once, 200+ court cases, live events for up to 3,000 people — high parallel load is normal for me.
- Three languages. Armenian C2, Russian C2, English C1 — site, client and documentation in whichever one the project runs in.
